ABSTRACT

Students who are beginning to use film as a medium of expression are sometimes more highly motivated to achieve excellence if they know channels through which they can seek acclaim for their films. Listed here are three highly accessible competitive events through which acclaim may be sought. Each event is described briefly, offering information about prizes, qualification requirements, type of film accepted, and entry fee. Additional film festivals are named, and it is suggested that more complete information about film festivals can be located in the "University Film Association Digest" of March, 1969. (Author/SH)

Students who are beginning to use film as a medium of expression are sometimes more highly motivated to achieve excellence if they know channels through which they can seek acclaim for their films. Many students are aware of various European film festivals, but regard them as remote and inaccessible. Listed here are several highly accessible channels that may serve students as gateways to both national and international acclaim. This does not mean to imply that merely entering any film in any contest guarantees instant success.

KODAK TEEN-AGE MOVIE AWARDS

Sponsored in cooperation with the University Film Foundation (UFF) on behalf of the University Film Association (UFA) and the Council on International Nontheatrical Events (CINE), this competition offers prizes ranging from $25 to $150. Students may qualify in various age brackets from 12 through 19 inclusive with cine-8 (sometimes called "regular"), super-8 or 16mm films in color or black-and-white, with or without sound. There are no entry fees involved in this set of awards. Complete information may be obtained by writing to:

COUNCIL ON INTERNATIONAL NONTHEATRICAL EVENTS

CINE is a voluntary, non-profit organization established to coordinate the selection of the United States nontheatrical, short subject, and television documentary motion pictures for submission to overseas film festivals. Winners receive CINE Golden Eagles or CINE Eagles and their films are qualified to represent the United States abroad. CINE is set up to handle all the complicated details of submitting CINE Golden Eagle and CINE Eagle films to appropriate international festivals and events around the world. (Suitable films that win Kodak Teen-Age Movie Awards are automatically submitted for CINE competition and Kodak pays the CINE entry fee.) Students too old to compete in the Kodak competition may send their best films direct to CINE. The amateur entry fee for CINE competition is $10. Complete information may be obtained by writing to:
